

Iranian Students Checked Here

(Continued from B-1) viewed privately by an investigator for a determination of his or her legal status in this country. Any students who are "out of status," violating their visas, will be told they can return voluntarily to Iran at U.S. expense or appear before an immigration judge for a deportation hearing.

Sholeh Afshar, 22, said she was waiting for her husband, Siavash, 27, whose visa was not in order. She said American friends recommended a lawyer who would accompany her husband through the processing and representing him at the deportation hearing.

Peter Ovanessoff, an Armenian who holds an Iranian passport, was through the process quickly. "All is in order," said the USIU second-year engineering student.

Although only college students or people holding student visas are being questioned, a woman showed up with two high school students. An immigration officer said, "We don't want high school students. Get rid of them. We don't even want to talk to them."

Mr. Carter ordered the "top priority" check on Iranians holding student visas in an effort to calm tensions between the Iranians and Americans angered over the holding of American hostages by Iranians at the U.S. Embassy in Tehran.

Immigration investigators spent last week setting up the screening process and interviewing Iranian students who reported on their own to the INS office. Area colleges provided the INS with the names and addresses of the Iranian students, who then were told where and when to report.

Those students who fail to report when notified will have to be tracked down by investigators.

Telephones still were being installed yesterday to connect the processing center and the INS offices a block away.

Several of the students questioned why they were being required to report again to the INS and many of them expressed concern that they would be deported even if their visas are in order.

"I don't like it because I have a chemistry class right now," said USIU premedical student Farzad Abbassian as he filled out the green form.

"I heard the U.S. to be a free country. It looks like that has been changed in the last few days. As far as I have heard, they will look for a reason to deport."

Asked why he thought he might be deported if his visa is in order, he said, "Probably because some other people burned an American flag."

Move Gains For American

She said a report of the young man's plight in the September 22 issue of The San Diego Union "brought forth an outpouring of offers to assist her, the formation of a group of citizens to bring him home and an offer by the San Diego Technical Institute to provide Jimmy with a full scholarship, provide training in the English language and a post secondary education in addition to full employment during the educational period."

In a telephone interview yesterday, Hayakawa said, "The Fannins are deeply compassionate and understanding to have taken up James Daniel's cause. I'm very happy to do all I can to bring him to the United States."

Several congressmen have also expressed interest in the case. Mona Knight, administrative assistant to Rep. Lionel Van Deerlin, D-Chula Vista, yesterday said the congressman had sent a letter by diplomatic pouch to U.S. Ambassador William Gleysteen in Seoul requesting he accept the circumstances of Bronson's birth.

In the event the ambassador should do so, Bronson would be declared a U.S. citizen and the lengthy process of a special congressional bill would be unnecessary.

Fannin said Bronson is considered a non-person by the Korean government and has no official status which prohibits him from attending school or working except in "slave labor" jobs where he earns only a meager supply of food and "an unhealthy place to sleep."
